This has been explained a little by myself in Philosophy 101 (philpapers induced) #2 – Abstract objects: Platonism or nominalism. Plato believed there was an extra realm where abstract ideas and universals existed. These days, this is less adhered to, and yet many are still realists believing that these abstracta are really real, in some way.

Big ideas:Theory of Forms; platonic relationship. Everything on earth, whether an object (such as a car) or an idea (such as justice), is actually an imperfect copy of an ideal and permanent “form” that exists somewhere, beyond our universe. This is known as the Theory of Forms. The place where all these ideal forms exist is guided by a heavenly force that Plato believed should influence our behavior.

Answer: Plato concludes that a belief can only be considered knowledge if it is justified and true. For example, if you believe the fastest way home is by highway because you’ve tested it and it’s true, that’s knowledge. If it isn’t true or you haven’t tested it (i.e., no justification), then it isn’t knowledge.
